Abstract. Classical random matrix theory provides the distribution of the angles between a fixed subspace and a random, uniformly distributed subspace. In this setting, the random subspace is created using independent Gaussian random variables. We present results extending these properties to matrices of the same form but with more general distribution. We also present results concerning subspaces generated from families of unitary matrices other than those with Haar distribution.